FFA has pioneered real player motion capture in soccer. With nearly 20 years of experience capturing real-time player motion, what's new this season? Why did the FFA and EA take this step? FFA and EA have a long history together in soccer, dating back to 1999 when EA launched FIFA Soccer on the PlayStation. Throughout the years, we've had two great goals in mind: to deliver the most authentic soccer experience possible and to strive for the finest gameplay experience for our players. By analyzing the execution of game techniques in real-time with the highest fidelity, we can make subtle changes that improve the core gameplay loop, such as influencing shots, tackling, aerial duels, and creating offense. Precision in FIFA is more important than ever. We use the data from real players on the pitch to drive game progression. Do we feel the same about the real-player motion capture used for FIFA 22? Real player motion capture has been part of the game since 1999. We started utilizing it for player movement, animations, pitch transforms, and player head poses. In FIFA 20, we made big leaps in real player motion capture: we recorded match-play sequences of two top World Cup squads, as well as more detailed animations of high-level players, including detailed real-world joints, muscle strength, and endurance. FIFA 20 was a significant step towards the goal of creating the most authentic soccer experience, but we're at a new stage in our collaboration with EA.

FIFA 22 continues to advance the real player motion capture model to deliver more complete player action, including nuanced animations of fine and gross body parts like elbows and thighs. We've also incorporated the most advanced simulation and gameplay technologies to create a more complete and authentic soccer game. As a result, we've set a new benchmark for players to look and play like real players on the pitch. To put it simply, we are the first developer that can capture and simulate the finer details of human movement. Today's FIFA players are strong, muscular, and very fast. We wanted to add the most realistic motion capture tool we could develop to enhance and improve our players' and our players' players' movements. How did EA implement real player motion capture in previous FIFA games? For years, we've had to manually track player movement within the game code and model the behavior. What did
