The program costs $119.99, and it must be installed and activated online. Although Photoshop Elements is a graphics editor, it does not include a word processor like Microsoft Word. If you want to create professional layouts for brochures, marketing materials and websites, take a look at Adobe InDesign. It's also a great program for creating text, including basic headlines, graphics and web-like fonts. A design plan (CS6) Before installing Photoshop Elements, you need a design plan. Here are the tasks you should tackle in this sequence: 1. Create layers 2. Work in 3-D 3. Use the Brush 4. Edit basic shapes 5. Create shapes 6. Adjust paths and text 7. Add text 8. Reorganize layers Work on Photoshop Elements In this step, we'll run through each feature and show how to use it. You'll work in the typical graphics environment, and you can apply any changes to your file through the Windows Explorer. Work with the Layers panel While working with Photoshop Elements, you'll have to pay close attention to the Layers panel (Window → Layers, or Ctrl+J). To hide or show layers, click the eye icon beside the layer name. Photoshop Elements automatically hides all layers but the active layer by default. Click a layer to see the tools listed in the panel, as shown below. Each tool has several options or options. Use the keyboard to change the layer's settings by using the Tab and arrow keys, or the Enter key to confirm a setting. Use the Perspective grid and the Move tools to change perspective and move layers. The following figure shows the tools that appear in the Layers panel. Work in 3-D You can work in a 3-D space in Photoshop Elements. Everything you draw or place is a 3-D object, including the image plane. 3-D objects are planes, as the name implies. Planes are horizontal, vertical or oblique planes. Objects are the camera-like viewing point that you use to look at the object. How to use the 3-D tools: Open any 3-D tool by clicking its icon, as shown here. The icon appears in the menu bar if you click the Tools menu and choose 3-D. Drawing

Q: What is the difference between private and protected in Java? Possible Duplicate: What is the difference between a private field and a “private” method? In Java, what's the difference between private field and protected method? I have heard some one saying, Protected is used only when we want to use that class in child classes, so does private field means in child classes we can't use that field? A: A public method might have a private field, but you can't access that field. A protected method must be accessed from within the same class, and as long as you don't declare it final you can also access that method from other classes. Private and package private methods can only be accessed from within the same package and therefore may have protected methods and/or public methods. All of these mean the same thing. All are members of a class that can only be accessed from within the same class or package. --- author: - | S. Belongie<sup>{1,3}</sup>, J. Malik<sup>{2,4}</sup>, and S. Q: Please vote once each to help users gain reputation Right now we have a reputation system which can easily be abused. For example, a user can have a huge number of upvotes/downvotes (without being a moderator). Let's imagine a user who has ~1000 upvotes. This number will obviously decrease once a user have reached 2000 reputation (or whatever minimum reputation required to vote). In our current system, if this user has spent an hour on the site, he can just wait until he gets enough reputation to upvote everyone around. I think that we should add a rule which if a user has 250 reputation, he can't downvote. if a user has 3000 reputation, he can't downvote. if a user has 10k reputation, he can't upvote. This will give all new users a competitive advantage. A: Your suggestion is inspired by the start of the system. When reputations were set to 500, you had to click for every vote. I doubt you'll reach a situation where it's impossible to vote as few users reach reputation 10k. Let's look at the different scenarios: if a user has 250 reputation, he can't downvote It's fine, they don't want to downvote if a user has 3000 reputation, he can't downvote This is not enforced, if he wants to, he can downvote until his reputation reaches 3000. There might be situations where he downvotes quickly. if a user has 10k reputation, he can't upvote I don't see the problem. He can upvote if he wants to, the main issue with it is there is a delay. On a different note, I don't think reputation is a good system. It shows what actions a user has done, not his competence. I'd even go further and say that it's misleading. Your reputation shows what actions you've done. As you can see, I haven't done as much as you have and yet my reputation is higher. I think we should change to a system of badges (which is the answer based reputation). The idea is simple, everyone start at 0, get their first badge (it's a bronze badge, I don't know the name of it right now, I'll edit this if I find it) and after they get 2 badges, they get another one. The badges are supposed to reflect
